Is Group discussion is very important in MBA Selection process

Typically a management institute employs more than one method of screening the candidates in admission process. At most of the B-school the selection process comprises the following.

Written test, Group Discussion (GD), Interview

As a manager, you will always be working in teams, as a member or as a leader. Therefore how you interact or work in a team becomes an important criterion for your selection. That is the reason why management institutes include GD as a component of the selection procedure.

The role of GD & Interview in MBA selection process

Why a group discussion required? GD and Interview assess the candidate's communication skills, knowledge level etc... It is very essential for potential management graduate and potential managers to have such group communication skill. A candidate without the ability to communicate his/her ideas effectively in a group situation will be a misfit in such an environment

Details of Group discussion

1. Group size : The number of participation in a group for GD varies from institute to institute or organization to organization

" While the average group size is between eight to twelve members, you should not be surprised if the group size is bigger. In some management institutes have had even 20 or more students per group in their group discussion."

2. Seating arrangement : The Participants of GD are made to sit together in a circular/semi-circular fashion. in a U-shaped or in a rectangle 'board room seating arrangement.

3. Time allotted: Normally each group is given 15 to 20 minutes for discussing the topic. " Ensure that you make substantive contributions within the first 15 to 20 minutes to avoid being caught on the wrong foot, especially if the GD is terminated ahead of scheduled time.

4. Communication by the moderator : The moderator focus on the approach you take to address the issue, and not on your prescription in the form of conclusion or solution.
